Christians working and praying for a nuclear weapons-free world

“It is better to light a candle ...

... than to curse
the darkness”

Easter Vigil at Aldermaston

Once again, Christian CND will be at Aldermaston for Easter Monday, which this year, is on 13th April.

Aldermaston is preparing to build the new UK £25bn Trident nuclear weapon replacement. This would break the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty by which the UK is pledged to ‘the elimination of all nuclear arsenals’ (Article VI).

We will meet at Tadley Gate, at midday. Tadley Gate is on the A340, parking opposite.

There will be a Liturgy followed by a walk around the base, with prayers at each gate.

All faiths and none are welcome. Bring clothing suitable for all weather conditions (there was snow at Easter last year!).

You could bring candles, or flowers to leave at each gate. Please do join us!

Last year's Ash Wednesday: Cross bearing images of Martyrs for Peace and 21 Theses of Peace by Philip Berrigan

Meet the members, Meet the Exec!

On Thursday 29th January, there took place the first of the “Meet the Members” evenings at the home of Mr and Mrs Tatton-Brown. Seven people were present which due to the limited capacity of most people’s front room was about right.

I went armed with printed and verbal material from CCND, and tried to give an outline of what the Executive actually does, the leaflets and booklets it publishes, the networks it contributes towards, and the campaigning it initiates or shares.

The meeting, however, was at least as interested in issue-based debate, especially Trident Renewal and the economics of the “independent” nuclear deterrent. Initiatives in schools were proposed and planned due to the presence of the Tatton-Brown son. So there is a possible extension of our educational work there. The literature rapidly disappeared as did quantities of coffee, tea and cake. Our gratitude is due to our hosts, and I hope that this worthwhile event will be the first of many.

New bags in stock!

We have just taken delivery of a new batch of cotton shopping bags. Like the previous bags, they are emblazoned with the CCND logo and the line: “Christians working and praying for a nuclear weapons-free world”. They have long handles to go over the shoulder, and a gusset making them especially roomy for all your shopping needs! They are also handy for carrying papers, A4 folders etc. They were made in India from organic cotton for a Southampton-based Fair Trade company, Vandanamu.

We also still have the short handle bags available as well. Why not order a couple and keep them in your bag or your car, then you will have no need for the dreaded plastic bags! £3 each plus 10% p&p.

A member ordered a long handled bag, amongst other things a few months ago. I sent the other goods with a note to say that the bag is being re-ordered. However, I cannot find the order form (it may well have been filed away by now). If YOU are that member, please get in touch and I will send you a new bag with grovelling apologies.

Doris Weston

Some CCND members may remember Doris Weston, who died recently. From the late 1950s onwards, Doris had become passionately involved in the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament, and in the development of the Oxfam campaign, helping to set up the first Oxfam 'shop' in Harrow. She was also confirmed into the Christian faith at St. Paul's Cathedral during this time. Doris went on the early Aldermaston marches was also involved in the Greenham Common protests - by that time she was living in Marlborough. She later moved to Marlborough Lodge where she would receive full time care and remain for the rest of her days.

Douglas Holdstock

We were saddened to hear of the death of Douglas Holdstock at the end of last year. As well as being a CCND member with his wife Mary, Douglas was a founder member of the Medical Campaign Against Nuclear Weapons, which joined MAPW to form Medact, one of the founding fathers of the World Court Project UK and a vice-president of World Disarmament Campaign. According to 'Other Lives' in The Guardian, Douglas was 'a worker for peace, all the more so because he was a scientist who understood the implications of nuclear weapons.' We know he will be sadly missed.

Our deepest sympathies to Mary and all the family.

For many years one of CND's strategic objectives had been to help bring about the closure of nuclear power stations in Britain. We want future energy generation to be by means of 'universally acceptable sustainable energy technologies' e.g. wind, water and solar power. Admittedly, this issue has received lower priority in our campaigning than, say, opposition to Trident; one of the reasons is that other environmental campaigns such as Friends of the Earth are better placed to take the lead. CND's particular concerns involve the links between nuclear power and nuclear weapons, the disposal of radioactive waste materials and the possibility of nuclear accident or sabotage.

Until fairly recently it seemed that enthusiasm for nuclear power expansion was on the wane. In 2000, Germany announced plans to phase out its nuclear generators and even Britain was becoming less keen, partly on account of the high costs of decommissioning borne by the taxpayers, the waste problem and public opposition. However, two developments have dramatically changed the picture. One is the escalating cost of fossil fuels and the unreliability of supplies from abroad. The other is climate change and the vital need to find ways of producing energy involving little or no carbon emissions. In the light of this, nuclear power appears to be an attractive option and powerful vested interests have been hard at work persuading governments around the world to invest in new nuclear power stations. We must remember too that under the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty all nations have the right to develop, research, produce and use nuclear energy for peaceful purposes subject to safeguards and inspection overseen by the International Atomic Energy Authority (IAEA).

Currently there are about 440 nuclear power reactors which generate sixteen per cent of the world's electricity. This would need to rise to 50 per cent to make any serious impact on carbon emissions. Also to be taken into account is the certain increase in demand for energy arising from population growth and the industrialisation of developing countries. Therefore an eight-fold increase in nuclear power generation could be on the cards by the year 2075.

A recent booklet by the eminent scientist Dr Frank Barnaby, a former Director of the Stockholm International Peace Research Institute (SIPRI), examines some of the consequences of this nuclear expansion. His assessments are rather discouraging.

First, the vastly increased demand will result in world stocks of suitable uranium running low in just a few years. Consequently, future development is likely to be dependent on plutonium, a fuel more easily adapted for use in nuclear weapons. It will also mean more use of fast breeder reactors about which many have serious reservations. Nuclear fusion generators are unlikely to be developed for many years, if at all.

Second, nuclear weapons proliferation becomes a greater risk if nuclear power generation expands and involves more countries. To quote Dr Barnaby, "Any country with a civil nuclear programme automatically has access, on its territory, to much of the technology and materials and expertise needed to fabricate nuclear weapons - civil nuclear technology and military nuclear technology are identical".

Third, there will be an added risk of nuclear materials falling into 'wrong hands'. Perhaps even now, terrorists could assemble primitive nuclear devices especially if generator grade plutonium or waste were to become available. Obviously, surveillance and security services around the world are very alert to this possibility. But even small amounts in the wrong hands pose a public danger, not least the 'dirty bomb' - conventional explosives present with nuclear material that could spread radiation over a wide area and at very least cause public panic.

The grim likelihood is that the achievement of nuclear disarmament will become much more difficult if a large expansion of nuclear power generation actually takes place over the next 25 years. Dr Barnaby himself believes it is vital to develop and implement ways of non power generation that are eco-friendly as a matter of great urgency, and we share that view. Until now, several of us in CND, myself included, whilst totally opposed to nuclear weapons have been somewhat ambivalent on the issue of nuclear power for peaceful purposes. The changes now taking place call for some fresh thinking and, hopefully, we in Christian CND have a useful contribution to make. If you have strong views on this matter please write or email the office so that we can pursue it further as a group.
